

No Second Person!!! Exercise

Rewrite the following paragraph on your own paper, correcting all usage of second person.

Revealing details about your private life on social media can be hazardous to your safety. For instance, if you revealed on Facebook that you were leaving on a weeklong trip to London, a person with bad intentions could use this information to rob your house and take your possessions. Keeping your information to yourself can eliminate your risk of being victimized. Another huge risk of giving out your personal information is having your identity stolen. The revelation of seemingly harmless information on social media, such as your name, your phone number, or your address, can be all a hacker needs to gain access to your personal information and wreak havoc on your finances and your life. This alone should teach people that keeping your information private protects your safety and your identity.
